

Power and place in Southeast Asia
A new sub-series for the KITLV Press Verhandelingen series

Series editors: Gerry van Klinken (KITLV), Edward Aspinall (Australian National University)

The series examines social struggles and their connection with the particularity of places in Southeast Asia. The declining potency of national states is shifting more scholarly attention to locally rooted contentions. Local politics are becoming a major focus of study in the region. From the slums to luxurious malls, from logging camps to coastal reefs, movements of identity and common interests are challenging the great homogeneities that once characterised our thinking about the nation-state. Whether they revolve around bureaucratic resources, housing, land, forests or water, they deploy cultural themes that mix memories of tradition with intimations of modernity. The series will embrace an ecumenicity of innovative approaches within the humanities, social and political sciences, while retaining a central role for 'power' and 'place'.

Indonesia will have a major profile in the series, but manuscripts will preferably offer a comparative Southeast Asian perspective.

The series will be of interest to senior undergraduate or graduate level readers in the following disciplines:

- * Area studies: Indonesia and Southeast Asia
- * Political science (local politics; political economy; identity politics; urban politics; rural politics; natural resource conflicts)
- * Anthropology (ethnicity and religion, urban anthropology, rural anthropology, cultural anthropology)
- * Sociology (urban sociology, rural sociology, environmental sociology, development studies)

Submissions will be peer-reviewed by two external reviewers using a single-blind system.

Contact: Gerry van Klinken (klinken@kitlv.nl), Royal Netherlands Institute of Southeast Asian and Caribbean Studies (KITLV), Postbox 9515, 2300RA Leiden, Netherlands, website: www.kitlv.nl.