This study presents preliminary findings from built-environment research based on audiovisual documentation from the Recording the Future project, which spans more than 22 years.

The recordings of everyday life document changes in three urban kampung inhabited by domestic migrants without formal land rights. This audiovisual archive reveals how residents survive within spatially and legally constrained environments, prompting them to creatively adapt and shape their surroundings. Ultimately, however, these communities are compelled to comply with government-led development programs that frequently marginalize or exclude them.
