Governing the marine frontier: Historical and contemporary dynamics of boundaries and mobilities in Chilean Southern Patagonia

Chilean Southern Patagonia has emerged as a frontier for the expansion of global networks of production and conservation. Marine salmon farming has expanded into peripheral coastal territories, while fisheries have been increasingly integrated into global commodity chains.

At the same time, state-led and private conservation initiatives have materialized through the establishment of various terrestrial and marine protected areas. Barrena analyses the strategies and actions undertaken by Indigenous nomadic peoples of the sea in response to the expansion of these global networks.
